edged, and therefore emotionally challenging. One such paper is Mercer’s re-development of the ‘chronic sorrow theory’, explaining the challenges facing partners of people with Parkinson’s disease, who necessarily become carers. In terms of transferability, read any progressive or debilitating condition in place of Parkinson’s disease.

Also employing a qualitative approach, McKinlay et al. uncover important issues in the care of multimorbidity, culturally and linguistically diverse people and Walker and colleagues explore nursing roles in primary care teams. Crowley et al. add to the teamwork discussions in this issue by showing that vocationally trained GPs, general practice registrars, and medical students are successively less aware and less confident in providing patients with nutritional advice, perhaps signalling a greater role for dietitians in primary health care.

To complete this issue’s offerings, Hamish Wilson distils his experience in peer groups to propose a structure for discussing challenging issues in peer group meetings, and our Back to Back column discusses the conflict between professional and regulatory permissions for off-site access to general practice records for research.

References

Erratum: Viewpoint article in our March 2015 issue—author details

The Viewpoint article entitled Peer support workers: an untapped resource in primary mental health care was published with incorrect author details as supplied. The first author of the paper is Juan J Tellez.

The paper should be correctly cited as: