Deputy Director of Public Health

Wellington New Zealand

When you're a physician, the chance to make an impact on an individual's life is one that happens on an almost daily basis. But opportunities to influence the health of an entire society come along much less frequently – and yet, that's exactly what's on offer here.

The Ministry of Health leads New Zealand's health system, providing advice to the Government on health and disability policy. The Office of the Director of Public Health works inside the Ministry to provide advice and help support public health actions that protect and benefit New Zealanders, and that's where your skills and leadership will be invaluable.

As a public face for public health, you'll be a trusted adviser to the Ministry on public health issues. Your specialist advice will be used to help plan and improve public health initiatives across the health and disability sector and other sectors where public health is a key focus. This means there will be a good deal of strategising as well as managing issues that are particularly important to the people of New Zealand.

This is a central government role that will get you into the heart of government. With New Zealand's small population, national roles such as this provide opportunities to support both high-level and local public health initiatives. And that means you can look forward to being involved in a wide range of issues for a wide range of groups.

Perhaps the most exciting prospect will be the chance to be a national and international voice on public health. In addition to its national role, the Office of the Director of Public Health works closely with the World Health Organization and other countries on regional and global public health issues.

You'll be a confident public health physician with a passion for public health and able to be an articulate and authoritative communicator. You might already be in a government department or similar, but most important is your ability to rise to the challenge and your capability to be a good adviser to the Ministry of Health.

This is an opportunity to have a direct influence on public health in New Zealand. In short, it's a public health role with a New Zealand lifestyle. You can enjoy the satisfaction of contributing to a healthier New Zealand.

To apply for this role or find out more, go to www.mohcareers.co.nz

Closing date: Sunday, 25 May 2014.
