

Supplementary material for

A trial reintroduction of the western quoll to a fenced conservation reserve: implications of returning native predators

R. S. West^{A,D}, L. Tilley^B and K. E. Moseby^{A,C}

^ACentre for Ecosystem Science, School of Biological, Earth and Environmental Sciences, University of New South Wales, Sydney, NSW 2052, Australia.

^BSchool of Biological Sciences, The University of Adelaide, Adelaide, SA 5005, Australia.

^CArid Recovery Ltd, PO Box 147, Roxby Downs, SA 5725, Australia.

^DCorresponding author: Email: rebecca.west@unsw.edu.au

Figure S1 Movements of a wild-caught male quoll in the first 15 days after release to the Arid Recovery Reserve. Numbers show nights since release, with missing numbers indicating the quoll was not located on that day. The two separate paths of movement before (solid) and after (dashed) capture outside the reserve and return to a female warren are indicated.

